A parametric algorithm is presented for the determination of the dipolar geometry of imaged emitters. The algorithm requires only the fundamental solution of Laplace's equation. The method shows agreement with previous heuristic definitions of the dipolar "figure". The algorithm is extended to include imaged emitters at a finite distance from a surface. Monte-Carlo simulations of the algorithm provide a precise solution. A method for quantifying the uncertainty in the parameters is given.ORLANDO, Fla. -- As he sat down

The glypican 3 (GPC3) gene, located on chromosome 8p, has been identified as a putative tumor suppressor. We hypothesized that loss of heterozygosity (LOH) of the GPC3 gene may be involved in the development of colon cancer, especially in familial colon cancer. To test the hypothesis, LOH of the GPC3 gene was analyzed by direct genomic DNA sequencing in 62 familial and 24 sporadic colorectal cancers, and the segregation of LOH was studied in 8 familial cases in which both the obligate germline mutation and the cancer were available. A perfect LOH at GPC3 was found in 2 of 8 familial cases (25%). These 2 familial cases were not associated with the obligate germline mutation. However, 1cdb36666d

Problem: Find the maximum number of consecutive zeros with constant time complexity. My attempt: We have n zero bits. I find the index of the first non-zero bit k where 0x400000...0x400000 == 0x40000000, then the previous zeros at that position. for (int i = 0; i = k && (i - k) = k) answer += (n - i); } The time complexity of this solution is O(n). This solution looks pretty messy for some reason and it seems like the result can be simplified to O(log n). Is there a better solution? A: I believe this problem is already in O(n), but it should be pretty easy to show that there is a solution in O(n). The issue here is the if-else condition. You can change that to if-else-if-else, and thus, create a decision tree. There is still only one starting point and one ending point, so the running time of the starting point and ending point is O(n). The running time from each point to the next point is O(1). Since there are n starting points and ending points, the entire solution runs in O(n), and since this is constant time complexity, the entire algorithm runs in O(1). Since the assumption of constant time complexity is usually used as a proof technique, this assumption is not very strong
